Possible changes ahead for diners

By CYNTHIA BRYSON
Staff Writer

Changes are coming to food services at Austin Peay State University. With the opening of the recreation center, scheduled for January, students will have access to a juice bar, and Einstein Bros. Bagel shop will replace the Ritazza coffee shop in the Morgan University Center during the winter break. A coffee kiosk will be installed in the Sundquist Science Complex.

According to Tom Callahan, director of Dining Services, all of these changes and additions are "part of the growth that the university had planned many years ago."

Callahan also said that a Habaneros Mexican Cuisine is another future possibility and would replace Bamboo Asian Cuisine. "We thought it might be a positive change in the food court. It's not carved in stone; we're still waiting for a proposal to convert that to a Mexican facility and see if it's going to be cost effective," Callahan said.

The APSU food services contract was awarded in July to Chartwells, a division of Compass — the world's largest food service operation. The contract is good for five years, and Chartwells plans to be a part of the rebidding process, according to Callahan, who has more than 30 years of food-service experience.

Once Chartwells earns a contract, it's placed in the "gold box," which is a program that ensures continuity of quality services. "Austin Peay, we earned their business, it's a special piece of business to us, and we want to make sure that we live up to the commitments that we promised when we bid the business," said Callahan. The goal is to keep a contract for life once it's secured.

"We're very customer-focused; we never want to lose track of our customers, and so this is just part of continuing a loyalty process," said Callahan. As part of this program, a representative from the corporate headquarters visits the campus once about every four to six weeks.

However, some students are disappointed with the food court at times. "A night that I want to eat a sandwich and they might be out of ham, or they might be out of pepperoni pizza; also by 8 or 9, they kind of shut things down before it's actually time for them to close," said Kristian Braden, 19, a healthcare management student.

"They [the food court] run out of fruit for the smoothies all the time, mainly strawberries," said Mary Carnahan, 18, nursing student. Her roommate, Jessica Lindsey, is also an 18-year-old nursing student and added that the food court was out of chicken three evenings in a row.

If students would like to see improvements, they do have that option. "We have a Web site, www.dineoncampus.com, and there's a place for you to write the director, so if a student sees, or has a problem with that, then they can just do me a favor and help me out to better understand," Callahan said.

Callahan said he appreciates feedback from students and finds it helpful. "If we're running out of food and they would communicate it to me, then I can put in motion the necessary controls and checks and balances to make sure it doesn't happen. That's not our intention, obviously," Callahan said.

Neither Carnahan nor Lindsey were aware of the Web site option for voicing comments.

Food prices are one item Callahan has received complaints about. "During the bid process you submit to the university what your pricing structure would be and that becomes part of your contract...but then after you get in, you start to have a reality check and [ask ourselves whether] the students can afford this on a day-to-day basis, and it is truly an alternative for them," he said.

Callahan also said that, if implemented, the Habaneros Mexican Cuisine concept will provide a lower-priced alternative.

When a person visits the dining Web site, they find a drop-down arrow that lists the universities. APSU is the first campus on the list.

Once APSU is selected, students will find links to menus, hours of operation and nutritional information, among other things. There is also a link to write comments or complaints.

One thing that won't be changing are the food court's hours of operation.

According to the Web site, the Pulse on Dining Restaurant is open Monday through Friday from 7 a.m. until 7 p.m. Saturday and Sunday, the hours are 11 a.m. till 6 p.m. The food court and Ritazza Coffee Shop are open Monday through Friday from 7 a.m. until 10 p.m.; on Saturdays from 11 a.m. till 6 p.m., and are closed on Sunday. Austin's Diner is open from Monday through Friday 7 a.m. until midnight, Saturday from 6 p.m. until midnight, and Sunday from 2 p.m. until midnight.

For more information on APSU food services, contact Callahan at Callahan@apsu.edu or 221-7036. The dining Web site can be reached at www.dineoncampus.com/apsu.♦

Professor presents research on Italian Jewish population

By KYLE NELSON
Staff Writer

Allene Phy-Olsen, professor of Languages and Literature, spoke in the university center Nov. 9 regarding the origin of the "ghetto" and the history of the Jewish population in Venice. Last summer, Phy-Olsen attended a seminar in Venice on this topic and her findings were presented in the faculty research forum.

She illuminated the topic by shedding light on the meaning of the word, "ghetto." Most people from history know this name from the Holocaust as the area that Nazi Germany held the Jews before they were sent to the concentration camps. In actuality the first ghetto was established in the early 1500s in Venice. According to Phy-Olsen, the ghetto began as anti-Semitism and racism in general was rising in Europe. The Venetian, in order to protect the Jews, moved them in an enclosed community on one of the islands in Venice; these communities were future ghettos. Phy-Olsen explained that the name ghetto came from the Venetian word for foundry, a foundry which was located on the island they were placed.

The Jews, Phy-Olsen said, remained stuck in the Jewish ghetto until they were liberated by Napoleon in 1796 when Venice was conquered by the general. Phy-Olsen said that when she visited the ghetto in the 1960s, all she saw was a dog and an old Jewish man who said, "Shalom." Now she said it was, "revitalized...a spot for Jewish tourists."

She stated that now the ghetto, with 20 some people still living there, is facing the threat of becoming a "museum," while Venice as a whole faces the threat of becoming a European Disneyland. Along with the threat of tourism mania, the Jewish population is dwindling due to assimilation and a low birth rate. In order to prevent the ghetto from disappearing, the people of the ghetto, "encouraged student groups and seminars on the ghetto," so that they could raise awareness of their home, Phy-Olsen said. The current population of Venice is nearly 60,000 permanent residents with only about 435 being Jewish as opposed to the 1800 Jewish people that lived there in 1931. During the persecutions of the Jewish people in the 1930s and 40s, the Italians protected their fellow Jewish Italians, for Phy-Olsen said that they were not very fond of the anti-Semitism that was strong in Europe at that time. After all, Benito Mussolini, the Italian dictator, had several Jewish mistresses.

Phy-Olsen comically added the names of the three districts that made up the ghetto. One, which was the first settled, is called the "Ghetto Novo" which means the new ghetto. The second one settled was the "Ghetto Vecchio," meaning old ghetto, and lastly the "Ghetto Novissimo" — the newest ghetto.

Phy-Olsen said that she was one of 26 people and religiously there were, "one Muslim, one Hindu, four Christian (two Catholic, two Protestant), and the rest were Jewish." As far as her motivation for going on the trip she said that, "I've always been interested in Jewish history. It's interesting and dramatic," and, "after all, who can resist a trip to Venice."♦

Increased tuition rates pose large hurdle to would be co-eds

By ELIZABETH BRUCE
Staff writer

Classes are not the only worry for college students. Getting accepted to college once seemed like the largest stressor for students. Recently though, rising tuition costs have added to the list of stressful college woes. Now students only worry if they will be able to pay for it.

The cost of attending a four-year college like Austin Peay State University rose 7.1 percent for the 2005-2006 academic year, according to CNN.com. That increase amounted to $5,491 more than students had paid the year before.

APSU tuition increased just 4.1 percent this year — the lowest increase in over a decade.

Sixty-three percent of students receive loans, grants or both according to the National Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators. Federal money, however, is not keeping up with the rising cost of tuition.

Ten years ago, 23 percent of financial aid was federal grants, and work-study comprised 2 percent. Last year, grants comprised only 20 percent, and work-study 1 percent. This data shows students are borrowing money at a much higher rate than before. This is due to less money being given at the federal level.

"I can speculate that there are some students taking out more loans and perhaps even delaying graduation for those taking classes [only] part time," said Mitch Robinson, vice president of finance and administration.

The debt for graduating seniors who borrow loans is around $20,000. Students are also relying more on loans from private institutions, which usually equates to a higher interest rates.

According to Donna Price, director of financial aid at APSU, in the past couple of years federal aid and grants have not kept up with the rising tuition costs, and it's having a definite effect on the students.

"Students are having to take out more money to attend and therefore have much less flexibility with their money," Price said.

The Pell grant is also shrinking in size as to how much it will pay the tuition. As of last year, it was still at $4,000, which with the rising tuition costs, is covering a smaller and smaller amount of students' overall expenses.♦

Talbots clothing funds scholarship for non-trads

Deadline for applications is Jan. 2

APRIL MCDONALD

Senior Staff Writer

Talbots Inc., a leading national retailer of specialty clothing for men, women and children, is once again offering its Women's Scholarship Fund for non-traditional students.

Established in 1997, the $100,000 scholarship program is available for highly-motivated women to begin or complete their undergraduate degrees.

The top five applicants are each awarded $10,000 with 50 additional applicants each receiving $1,000. Applications must be postmarked by Jan. 2, 2007, or before the first 1,000 eligible applications have been received, whichever is earlier.

Applicants will be notified by the end of July. To be an eligible applicant for the $10,000 award, one must be seeking a bachelor's degree from a four-year college or university.

Those attending accredited two-year universities or vocational-technical schools are only eligible for the $1,000 award. In addition, one must have earned their high school diploma or GED at least 10 years ago.

While writing the essay portion, Talbots asks that applicants consider the following: what impact a degree will have on your life; why it is important for you to complete a degree and what personality strengths you feel you possess that will help attain this goal.

An official transcript of grades must also be included, along with the completed financial information section.

"Finishing my degree means more than just accomplishing a goal," said Elizabeth Kokos of Glenwood, Wash., and a 2005 winner of a $10,000 scholarship.

"It means financial freedom; freedom from the bonds of poverty, freedom to finally have the good things in life.

Completing my degree will give me the opportunity to help others realize that it is never too late for an education." ♦

Weekly SGA Round-up

By KYLE NELSON

Staff Writer

The Student Government Association senate meeting on Nov. 8 started off by passing one resolution and preparing the floor for some other legislation.

TISL

The TISL (Tennessee Intercollegiate State Legislature) resolution passed this week. This bill establishes that Austin Peay State University will send a delegation to the TISL event every year.

The bill was amended to state that it would not force a delegation to go every year if the student body decides not to attend. The SGA president will form a committee to oversee the preparations of this event every year.

The bill initially was to be tabled until the TISL event was held this year so that SGA senators attending could observe the organization of the event.

However, due to a mishap while voting — some senators seemed to be unaware of the order of business that needed to be done so that they could amend and table the bill — the bill was passed.

SOARE returns

The SOARE (Student Organization for the Advancement of Renewable Energy) bill was brought into new business last week.

This revised version of the previous piece of legislation that was voted down in October will be voted on Nov. 15.

This bill will once again bring about a referendum on the topic of green energy for APSU. The referendum question will read, "Do you support Austin Peay State University increasing its energy efficiency and usage of renewable energy in order to benefit your health and environment by paying a renewable energy fee not to exceed $10 per semester?"

News

SGA President Nick Pitts announced to the Senate that the President's Cabinet was considering a policy change that would have students wear their student ID cards around their necks so that they remain visible. Pitts stated that the cabinet was considering this for safety issues due to the fact that anyone can walk onto campus.

The issue was brought to the senate's knowledge so that the senators could seek the student body's opinion on the possible policy change. ♦

Japanese ministers vow to tackle teen suicides, push education reform

TOKYO (AP) - Top Japanese ministers on Monday vowed to push for changes in the country's public education system following a chain of teenage suicides linked to bullying.

Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuhisa Shiozaki called the recent student deaths "a grave concern" and urged schools, families and neighbors to take steps to better protect youths.

He also urged a government education panel to tackle the problem as part of a planned overall reform, which is one of Prime Minister Shinzo Abe's top political goals.

Education Minister Bunmei Ibuki blamed deteriorating social morality.

"We have to seek ways to restore ties among families and the community, which are now shifting all their responsibility on teachers," Ibuki said. Bullying and signs of suicide can be easily overlooked amid weakening family ties and indifference in the neighborhood, he said.

The comments come amid a string of suicides by children who indicated they had been bullied at school, including two who killed themselves on Sunday.

A 14-year-old boy hanged himself inside a barn at home in Saitama, just outside Tokyo, after classmates blackmailed him, police said. In western prefecture (state) of Osaka, a 12-year-old girl threw herself from an apartment building to death.

The latest victims followed three other teenagers who killed themselves over the last few weeks, during which the Education Ministry received letters believed to be from students warning of their plans to commit suicide.

Ibuki said he has so far received nine similar letters, of which four senders have been identified and contacted for protection. Five others, however, have not been able to be identified.

Ibuki, 68, said bullying is not new but has become "more insidious." But he also warned school and education officials against covering up attempts to avoid embarrassment.

SGA President Nick Pitts announced to the Senate that the President's Cabinet was considering a policy change that would have students wear their student ID cards around their necks so that they remain visible. Pitts stated that the cabinet was considering this for safety issues due to the fact that anyone can walk onto campus.

S. Korea balks at taking new measures to sanction N. Korea for nuclear test

SEOUL, South Korea (AP) - South Korea balked Monday at Washington's demand that it fully join a U.S.-led effort to intercept North Korean ships suspected of carrying supplies for the North's nuclear and missile weapons programs.

The South insisted that it was already doing enough to stem possible weapons proliferation from North Korea — which detonated a nuclear bomb on Oct. 9 — and announced no new measures to sanction the North under a U.N. Security Council resolution condemning the test.

The decision underscored Seoul's reluctance to anger Pyongyang and complicated efforts to resolve the standoff over the North's nuclear program now that the communist regime has agreed to return to long-stalled international nuclear disarmament talks.

"It's basically not necessary to take (new) measures," Park In-kook, a deputy foreign minister, said at a news briefing, citing "the unique circumstances" on the Korean peninsula as motivating the South's decision not to fully join the U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI.

Seoul has joined the initiative aimed largely at stopping North Korean weapons traffic at sea, which has gained new impetus since the North's nuclear test, only as an observer out of concern that its stopping and searching North Korean ships could lead to armed clashes with North Korea.

Monitoring North Korean shipping would be much more difficult without South Korea, because countries in the initiative can only conduct searches within the territorial waters of participating countries. Ships on the high seas have right of free passage under international law.

South Korea is to submit a report Monday on how it would carry out the unanimously adopted Security Council resolution to a U.N. committee charged with overseeing the sanctions on North Korea.

The resolution bans the sale of major arms to North Korea and calls for the inspection of cargo entering and leaving the country.

It also calls for the freezing of assets of businesses supplying the North's nuclear and ballistic weapons programs, as well as restrictions on sales of luxury goods and travel bans on Pyongyang officials. ♦

THE ALL STATE

OUR TAKE

Food's great; only if you get to eat it

It's dinnertime, and we at The All State have the munchies. Fortunately, a delicious array of dining options await us upstairs in the Morgan University Center. Indeed, we must award some much-deserved kudos to the dining services provided by Chartwells, the newly contracted food company here at Austin Peay State University. The changes that we've seen, for the most part, have certainly been for the better.

The new additions to the food court have seen and continue to see positive feedback. This is not much of a surprise since the company canvassed nearly 400 students according to Tom Callahan, the director of dining services. Through this survey, many of the students were able to give their opinions and requests of what they wanted to see happen this semester. This survey eventually led to the addition of the Mesquite Ranch BBQ & Grill as well as the Bamboo Asian Cuisine. The student-driven philosophy of Chartwells definitely shows in this regard.

A good ol' political thumpin'

A good ol' Texas-Style thumpin' President Bush's words not mine. This is a president not prone to a whole lot of analysis and second-guessing and appropriately enough, Dubya didn't seem to engage in either of these less than manly traits. At least not publicly. No, he will probably let the whiz kid, the architect of his presidential victories, Mr. Karl Rove, read the morning after the election "tealeaves." And this is what the leaves look like in the wake of the tidal wave (not quite a Tsunami) of change after the November 7 mid-term.

elections — the Democrats regained control of both the House (232-202) and the Senate (51-49). Pat Robertson's worst nightmare (other than say, being abandoned in the San Francisco SoHo area about 2 a.m. "sans" a ride home) also came true as that "Latte Liberal," Nancy Pelosi, became the new House Speaker. Just call her "Madame Speaker." Yes, that Ms. Pelosi, who during this most recent election was said to have accused President Bush of being both incompetent and in denial. I'm not sure if she meant Dubya was in denial about being incompetent or about the failure of the Iraqi operations, which Speaker Pelosi also used to cuff the Bush Administration about its collective head and shoulders. Either way, a day after the election results our President and the certain-to-be new Speaker sat down for a luncheon at the White House for, ostensibly, an attempt at "burying the hatchet" and in the words of Tony Snow, White House Press Secretary, a chance to "make nice." Ms. Pelosi was said to have dined on smoked pheasant, President Bush choked down a heaping order of crow (okay, they may have both had fajitas for all I know, what am I the head chef?).

So, just what do these election results portend and how can they possibly be explained in the time it takes to read, digest and reflect upon this column? Well first, just be sure you are sitting down because the truth can be both shocking and harsh. Ready? Americans don't like the current policy in Iraq and blamed the incumbent president and his political party who have controlled the levers of power for the past six years. I know you are aghast. But brace yourself, here come the second and third cluster bombs — voters also found Republican, high-profile scandals to be both repugnant and hypocritical (as any scandal worth its weight in late night talk show coverage should be) and the Democrats finally proved to be a little less stubborn than their donkey namesake and moved their politics to the center of the spectrum.

Okay, first things first — we, Americans have been growing increasingly restless and impatient with the news coming out of Baghdad for quite some time. Despite the ever-changing reasons and rationale for our presence there since its inception (U.N. violations, WMDs, Regime-Change, axis of evil, evildoers, Saddam as a bad-man, haven for terrorists, spreading democracy — take your pick) Republicans may have escaped loss of legislative control if an expedient and clear exit strategy could have been seen somewhere on the horizon by voters. But Truly, their food makes all of us here at The All State feel warm in all the right places. However, we do feel compelled to voice that we don't always feel satisfied with Chartwells. More specifically, we're not happy with the fact that several of the dining locations run out of food and then close down before the designated closing time. To this, we give a stern wag of our collective fingers.

Furthermore, it would be nice for dining services to update the operation hours of some of their locations. The Peay Pod convenience store, for example, is closed on Sundays; however, the online schedule says that the hours are 3 to 10 p.m. on both Saturday and Sunday.

Despite some discrepancies with opening hours, we feel that Chartwells is doing a good job. And with such undertakings of catering to our college, it's not expected for the company to get everything perfect the first time around. For the future, then we will be hoping for some improvement. ♦ even up to Election Day we heard a timetable for change anywhere from 5 to 12 years of continued military presence and quasi-occupation. On top of all of this, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld continued to be stridently and stubbornly (what is he, a closet Democrat?) defiant in the face of growing criticism of his management of this war. Well, within hours of the election results, Mr. Rumsfeld (Rummy to his good friends) resigned and President Bush named Texas A&M president, Robert Gates, a former CIA and military guy to be Rummy's replacement. Look for talk of an accelerated exit strategy and phased withdrawal of troops and possible "carving up" of Iraq into sectors that closely mirror age-old sectarian divisions between the Sunnis and Shiites. Also be on the lookout for a re-emergence of Colin "told ya so" Powell, who was never a big booster for this war, at least not privately. Speaking of public silence, just what is Condoleezza Rice thinking these days? Rumor has it she didn't take too kindly to the electoral thumpin'. She sure can ice-skate and play the piano though, so she'll be just fine.

Secondly, sex scandals. From Mark Foley to the not-so-good reverend Ted Haggard to Don Sherwood, Republican strategists were no doubt cursing internet sex solicitation, same-sex infidelity and illegal drug use, and let's not forget infidelity and allegations of wife, er, mistress-beating. Needless to say, Democrats won at least two House seats mostly just on the collective naughtiness of the gang of three noted above. Everybody has skeletons in their closets but man, these skeletons had in political parlance "legs" and they ran those guys right out of the office and pulpit.

Thirdly, the donkey moved to the center. Democratic candidates openly talked about church, God, prayer and fiscal conservatism and by design, didn't talk as much about gays, same-sex marriage or abortion. In fact, this election seemed to beg the question, just which party was most eager to step up and take a jab or two or three at the Bozo-punching-doll named same-sex marriage? Without a scorecard or Wolf Blitzer and his media "wall of candidates" it was tough at times to tell who was the Republican and Democratic candidate. When the electoral magic dust cleared it was the "Blue-Dog" Democrats who may have been most responsible for handing Speaker Pelosi her gavel to run the House and not their more left-leaning colleagues. Now if Ms. Pelosi can use that gavel to knock some sense into John Kerry and his "comedic styling" both she and Howard Dean can both breath a lot easier come 2008 when Hillary Clinton (she won by the way, again) and her presidential coronation team sweep into New York.

Finally, here in the Volunteer State, Bob Corker squeaked by Harold Ford Jr., in a tightly-contested race that both men said had nothing to do with race. Actually, I choose to believe them. This outcome probably had more to do with family, perceptions about political seasoning and a decision by Corker to distance himself from the White House and Iraq. Either way, we actually had to suffer through an interview with the actress who posed as a Playboy bunny and seductively beckoned Mr. Ford to "call me" in a particularly notorious political ad run during the campaign. And what did we learn in about her in this interview? That she isn't really a true "blonde." Now I'm aghast. What next? A woman president? Maybe, just maybe. I'll save that for next election. ♦

'Reverse racism' does exist

I am responding to Kasey Henricks' article asserting that reverse racism is a myth since there is a racial disparity between blacks and whites in areas like income, education and housing (Nov. 8, "Little white lies conceal the myth of reverse racism"). First, I do not disagree with the entirety of the article. Yes, there is an unequal distribution of wealth in our country, and yes, even in our great state. Thank you for pointing this out. After all, every human deserves life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. It would be difficult to attain, for example, liberty if one was under financial burden, or happiness if one lived in a tiny run down home working a minimally paying, unfulfilling job.

One could reasonably correlate the phenomenon of unequal distribution of wealth to race. However, correlation does not equate causation. Furthermore, even if racial privilege did cause unequal distribution of wealth, that alone would not be grounds to claim that reverse racism is a myth.

Actually, reverse racism has and still does occur. For example, until 1999, Metro Nashville Magnet Schools' lottery for admission had a racial weight. Before the school system heard rumors of an ensuing lawsuit in 1999, they used a racial quota system that guaranteed a 30-50% black enrollment at the magnet schools.

Essentially, of the students who met grade and testing qualifications, whites had a much smaller chance than blacks to be selected. The reason this situation in particular eats me up is because it impacted my family. In 1996, my number was selected; I attended Meigs Magnet. Not only was I able to attend an academically-focused school, but I avoided being bused into downtown Nashville to go to Buena Vista, the school for which I was zoned. Although there was a middle school (Two Rivers Middle) less than a mile from my house, I was zoned to go 13 miles and another world away. (Thanks, desegregation!)

However, the next year, my sister's number was not selected, although she was qualified and in the pool. Maybe it would have never been picked, even if there was no racial preference. Still, discrimination was involved. Reverse racism, if you will. Yes, things turned out okay. My family moved out of the Metro School District. I only went to Meigs for a year. Even without Meigs, I still made it to college, with scholarships no less. Despite the seemingly good outcome, this is one example that proves discrimination exists not only for blacks but for whites, as well.

When considering the obvious unequal distribution of wealth, wouldn't it be much more constructive to examine cultural and familial factors that accompany race rather than calling names or looking for easy answers, like reparations? Are today's "racist, Southern bigots" really responsible for the fact that a number of children are born into poor neighborhoods where renting is the norm? For the fact that the same children attend crappy schools and have fewer opportunities to

Moderates continue screwing up elections

OK. So last week's picks were overly cautious. The Democratic Party victory in the House was double what I had forecasted. But in fairness, the Republicans ended up only a few thousand votes shy of hanging on to the Senate, Lincoln Chafee did indeed lose in Rhode Island, and Bob Corker did prevail in Tennessee, so technically I broke even.

Now I'm being asked by my editor to analyze what it all means. Sure, why not? However, discretion being the better part of valor and considering the current state of flux that exists, I think I'll offer up a general sort of observation and avoid specifics for now.

I would like to focus for the moment on the (very typical) reaction of many on the losing side — pundits mostly, rather than the politicians themselves — who are telling us now that the loss was due to — what else — the stupidity of the electorate. Well, we shouldn't be too hard on the Republican partisans who were lashing out last week against the voters. After all, Democratic partisans reacted in much the same way following John Kerry's defeat in 2004.

In November 2004 many on the left were calling the Red-Staters a bunch of redneck, inbred, uneducated, hopelessly mind-numbed robots controlled by Rush Limbaugh and talk radio.

In fact, we were told, the Red-Staters were in effect a bunch of welfare recipients, living off the productivity and taxes of Blue-Staters. Some hyper-partisan types even suggested that the Blue States should secede from the Union, after which the Red States would surely descend into the Third-World status befitting a bunch of morons too stupid to know what was good for them.

Back then (it seems so long ago), Republicans derided this childish attitude and hailed the electorate as courageous, far-seeing and wise (forgetting that not too many years before they were deriding the American people as a bunch of corrupt and immoral swine for not supporting the Clinton impeachment).

Today, of course, the wise and moderate voters that swung the 2004 election to George Bush have somehow morphed (in the minds of some) into a bunch of cringing and craven cowards. They voted Democrat because they hate the troops. Al-Qaeda and Hezbollah told them to vote Democrat (or else) and pursue higher education? No!

I don't pretend to have all the answers, but there is so much more than skin color or racism behind why people have the jobs they do, why they live where they live and why they pursue the level of education they do. Systems play a part, and personal choices play a part. In redistributing wealth, one should reform unjust systems when he identifies them. In the meantime, he could teach people to rise above their situations. Educating people is more effective than handing them money. Instead of creating a victim mentality, someone that may have been born the "underdog" is empowered to rise above their situation. Philosopher Epictetus said it best: "Only the educated are free."

Finally, be careful who you accuse of living in a "society based on exploitation." American society by its very essence exploits others. When you or I shop anywhere that outsources labor, we almost certainly exploit people in other parts of the world. Neither child labor nor people working for pennies have gone away. Americans' plush lifestyle depends on others worldwide sacrificing themselves. Whether or not you or I fly the Confederate flag, I exploit, you exploit, we ALL exploit.

I'm gonna burn one down

I have kept quiet on the whole smoking issue up till this point. I voted against banning smoking to the parking lots, and even though I do not think the vote was publicized enough I have adhered to the new policy. Fortunately for me I have to cross the Trahern lot between classes anyway, so this hasn't been too big of an inconvenience for me. It is not uncommon to see a large group of fellow smokers likewise following the rules and lighting up around the benches in the corner of the Trahern lot. It's sad that by passing this new rule the SGA has created the very thing it said it wanted to remove — large groups of smokers who create large "clouds of smoke" for people to walk through. This morning when walking to class I couldn't help but notice two very large no smoking signs around the benches bordering the Trahern lot. This is just too much. The Trahern lot is a designated smoking area! Is it the goal of SGA to block traffic by making smokers stand in the middle of the parking lot instead of allowing them to sit at the benches safe from dangerous young drivers impatient to find a close parking spot? I would like to remind everyone that the original plan that was voted for included a promise to provide enclosures for smokers. Sadly that was an empty promise, and now not only do we not get shelter from the winter weather, we are not even allowed to sit on a bench and avoid traffic. Thank God for young politicians.

Mary Clement, Jr.

they obliged. What else can you expect from a bunch of mind-numbed robots who hang on every word that spews from the mouths of leftist traitors like Rosie O'Donnell and Keith Olbermann?

This version of events is dovetailed with the current right-wing perception of the Democratic Party base, which is that it is made up primarily of illegal immigrants and welfare recipients who literally vote for a living. On Election Day they all get a sandwich, a bottle of screw-top wine and a pack of cigarettes before piling onto buses to go vote for the candidate that hates America the most. Put that base together with a bunch of spineless moderates who have been led astray by the mainstream media and what you get is what happened last Tuesday.

All right, enough of that. The point I'm getting at here is that it is far too simplistic, bordering on delusional, for either side to swing wildly between descriptions of the electorate as bovine-stupid in one moment and sagacious in the next.

Partisans on both sides love these neat theories, but as explanations they just don't work in the real world. The problem is more often with the parties than with the electorate, and the consistent problem for both parties is that once they attain power they tend to start thinking they have a right to be there, rather than having a responsibility to justify their position.

Unfortunately, too many partisans see independents and moderates as a problem to be overcome rather than as a reliable barometer of the political atmosphere. While rabid partisans accept that the opposition party is evil and insane, they perceive their counterparts as having the saving grace of being consistent, unlike those lukewarm, wishy-washy moderates who refuse to see that one side is right and that the other is wrong, wrong, wrong. At least the other side has an excuse; they're insane. Moderates, on the other hand, are just willfully perverse. They just enjoy screwing up elections.

With a government now divided between different parties controlling the executive and the legislature, we will be warned repeatedly in the coming months of the evils of gridlock. However, history provides a more dire warning of the consequences of unchecked power. The upside to all of this is that we are very, very far from installing a Hitler or a Stalin, in large part thanks to perversely independent-thinking people who, truth be told, have a pretty good handle on what really makes this country tick.

As for the losing party in this or any other election; they can follow the path taken by some over-the-top pundits and rail about the stupidity of the electorate, or they can get busy figuring out what went wrong and how to fix it. My guess is that the political professionals will opt for the second choice. ♦

This day in history: 1777

After 16 months of debate, the Continental Congress, sitting in its temporary capital of York, Pennsylvania, agrees to adopt the Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union on this day in 1777. Not until March 1, 1781, would the last of the 13 states, Maryland, ratify the agreement.

Artist tackles the video generation

SHANNA MOSS/STAFF

SHANNA MOSS/STAFF

SHANNA MOSS/STAFF

SHANNA MOSS/STAFF

The theme of "Light in a Box" is video culture and the negative effects it has on society. The medium being used here is video displayed on TVs and monitors. Although Trice is critical of video in this exhibit, he hoped to present a message of moderation in video and media intake.

Trice's art exhibit offers a barrage of imagery to display the effect of excess media usage

By HEATHER CLARK
Staff Writer

When entering the Trahern student gallery to see "Light in a Box," Lee Trice's senior art exhibit, there are things that grab your attention right off the bat.

The darkened room is a jumble of noises and sounds, and one of the pieces is an Atari hooked up to a television in the corner. People were allowed, even encouraged to play.

The chaos of the small space is both distracting and magnetic as you take in images of violence and video clips of the inane.

Trice, a graphic design student, has taken a

"harm springs from excess" approach to this show, using the strengths of the very media he works with to show "its own faults and negative effects."

For the past few years, scientists have worked to prove that a link exists between excessive television in childhood and Attention Deficit Disorder (ADD).

Trice's exhibit embodies this concept.

Walking through the room, you feel your attention span being stretched to the limit as you sift through the whirlwind of sensory overload for bits you can remember or identify with.

In one corner is a video loop of strange scenes of violence next to a smashed-up television; another corner houses the charred remains of a book in front of Nazi book burning footage and video text from Ray Bradbury's "Fahrenheit 451," a story of a futuristic world where books are outlawed and people watch television excessively.

While slightly unsettling, the work is undoubtedly compelling.

It forces participants to evaluate their own lust for television and repetitive media fodder.

"Some people said it made them feel uncomfortable," Trice says.

Among Trice's list of influences for this project are Ray Bradbury, Orson Welles and the loud TVs at Wal-Mart.

Without question, these influences shine through in this creation.

It certainly speaks to a certain generation, one that was inundated with computers, television and video from a very early age.

Some people might find it odd that a graphic design student, a person who uses video to create, would choose to create an exhibit that paints video and television in such a negative light.

Trice's idea behind this project was to show the importance of moderation when it comes to media consumption.

Trice drew upon the words of Edward R. Murrow to explain: "...Otherwise, it is merely wires and lights in a box." ♦

Dresden Dolls' live show enhances new album

By JOHN LUDWIG
Assistant Perspectives Editor

The Dresden Dolls, the Boston duo composed of drummer Bryan Viglione and singer/pianist Amanda Palmer, are currently on tour for their latest album, "Yes, Virginia...," an infectiously catchy compilation of songs centered on eye-brow-raising topics such as sex, drug abuse, masturbation and back-alley abortion.

For those who aren't aware of the album title's reference, "Yes, Virginia..." refers to a letter submitted by Virginia O'Hanlon to The New York Sun in 1897.

The little girl's letter asked the paper's editor if Santa Claus is real. The editors, in turn, ran the letter with a reply affirming that, indeed, jolly Kriss Kringle does exist.

Palmer goes on to explore Virginia's doubt in the song "Mrs. O," as observed in the lyrics, "and yes, Virginia, all because / the truth won't save you now...but you can stop the truth from leaking / if you never stop believing."

The new album consists of 13 songs, which act as a window into Palmer's twisted soul. Nearly all the songs contain some element of taboo as do the songs from their previous, self-titled album.

However, rather than offending as one would assume, the music surprisingly hooks you in on the account of it being so catchy and upbeat.

In spite of the naughty merriment that pervades the album, the band keeps the content varied, though, with a few somber songs like "Delilah" and "Me and the Minibar."

For example, the song "First Orgasm," in which Palmer sings about her "...first orgasm of the morning," is a rather depressing yet awkwardly powerful song.

The song is very quiet and slow initially, but builds gradually into a powerful crescendo that parallels Palmer's gaining climax as she screams for someone to hold her. Double entendres never sounded so delectable.

It must be said, however, that their music sounds best live.

Songs like "Mandy Goes to Med School" and "My Alcoholic Friends," which the band recently played in Knoxville, rocked the Bijou Theatre by creating a jovial and care-free atmosphere much along the lines of an uproarious bar or a raving speak-easy.

Among the other songs they played were "Truce," "Backstabber" and a rocking cover of Black Sabbath's "War Pigs." In addition, Trash McSweeney of The Red Paintings joined the Dresden Dolls for a cover of "Mad World" by Tears for Fears.

Much to the delight of the fans, the band played for nearly three hours straight that night in Knoxville.

When most bands play for only one and a half to two hours, this display of endurance is very impressive.

The band's aesthetics are a surprising treat to the unsuspecting.

The Dresden Dolls' self-described style of "brechtian punk cabaret" boasts the employment of theatricality and improvisation.

Usually fashioned in costume and painted faces, the duo's highly animated body movement and facial expressions make the two reminiscent of walking caricatures. Palmer's painted eyebrows make for an especial visual trait.

In terms of improvisation, however, anyone who has been to a concert can testify to their unscripted discourse as they randomly ask the audience to tell them which songs to play.

With the release of their second album, The Dresden Dolls deliver an eclectic sound full of farcical, upbeat melodies and blunt, emotional angst.

In a music industry currently flooded with bland, overly produced music, the new album "Yes, Virginia..." is a breath of fresh air. ♦

Vesta Rose incorporates positive message, eclectic sound into 'Mission of Best Intent'

By A.J. DUGGER
Staff Writer

"A Mission of Best Intent" is the title of an upcoming release from a local rock group known as Vesta Rose.

Founded in Nashville, Tennessee, the group has its own special, distinctive sound, combining elements of grunge, alternative, punk and even blues into their music.

Austin Peay State University student John Holland plays bass in the group.

"I try to incorporate some funky stuff," said Holland, sophomore music major.

Holland has been playing guitar since age 13. The 19-year-old is a very polite and easy going individual, but none of that matters when his fingers let loose on that bass guitar.

The group also features lead guitarist Christian Powell, 27, and drummer Tyler McConnell, 19.

Inspired by rock legends like Nirvana and Pearl Jam, the group has recently been promoting their upcoming album.

"A Mission of Best Intent" takes its listeners on a journey.

From the opening mellow guitar intros and drumming on the first track, it is made clear that these guys are not amateurs.

Vesta Rose's lead singer, Christian Powell, uses his voice wisely.

The singer really emotes with his voice, bringing the lyrics to life.

He yells and pleads at times, but he refuses to flat out scream and damage his voice, which saves the dominant voice of Vesta Rose in the long run.

The album's tracks run smoothly.

There are no interludes or breaks.

Nothing but music, and normally, each track makes a smooth transition to the next one, so many of the songs begin right where the last one ended.

It's almost like listening to one continuous performance of all the songs.

Most of the band's songs are written and structured by lead singer, Powell, but one exception on this album is the third track, "Dannum." This song was created from a rehearsal jam session, and each member made contributions and arrangements.

Each song is arranged nicely, with a wise balance of louder and softer moments.

Some of the tracks have loud chorus parts, and bridges that contain snippets of the blues.

It took a total of three weeks to complete the album, which contains eight tracks.

Aside from providing good music, Vesta Rose also brings a positive message.

"The songs are about overcoming problems and feelings of hopelessness," said Holland.

Vesta Rose is signed to Spat! Records, and will have a CD release party for their debut LP at "The End" in Nashville on Friday, Nov. 17, from 9 p.m. to 12 a.m.

To get more information on Vesta Rose, go to Myspace.com/VestaRose. "A Mission of Best Intent" is a true display of talent, with an original sound, and it displays the musical genius of a promising APSU student. ♦

Online shopping continues to give consumers advantage

Holiday season will boost upsurge of online shopping fueled by price, availability

By ALEXANDER ELLIOTT
Staff Writer

As each year passes, online shopping continues to increase in popularity, ease of use and overall functionality.

According to a survey released by the National Retail Federation, "One in four holiday purchases will be made on the Internet this year." To put that in numbers, Jupiter Research forecasts that these purchases will amount to some $32 billion in online holiday sales alone.

So what factors have contributed to such a spike in e-commerce? Price, availability and exclusivity seem to be the main motivators.

Ed Dworsky, operator of Consumerworld.org, says, "consumers not using the Internet are at a disadvantage" and "knowledge-wise, it provides lots of information on products and features, and then price-wise, it allows you to compare without going to the stores."

To elaborate on his view, Dworsky tells of a situation in which he bought a modem from Circuitcity.com for $49.99 and was asked to complete the purchase in a physical store. When he went to the store, the clerk rang up the modem price at $79.99. Due to shopping online, however, he was given the lower price instead.

The Luxury Revolution

It wasn't very long ago that Michael Kors, Louis Vuitton and Marc Jacobs could only be sought after in a handful of stores, in a handful of locales. However, these prominent fashion figureheads have finally thrown in the towel and have started their own online boutiques. In addition, some designers have partnered with eLuxury.com, a site dedicated to distributing luxury goods across the globe. For those who want the look without necessarily paying the price, a new Web site, Like.com, is the perfect answer. By typing in a specific phrase or product, the site then searches over thousands of pages to report matching items at competitive prices.

"It works good enough," said Munjal Shah, Like.com's chief executive. "We've found that this is an application where the failings of the technology can be an asset (referring to the search engine). People will look at an error and say, 'I didn't know there was another item that was close, but with a different design.'"

Another unique feature found on the site is the ability to shop through a celebrity's wardrobe, which displays actual pieces of their clothing and enables consumers to buy the exact items or close replicas.

The prior examples are just a couple of the many ways to save big through shopping online. Here are three more ways to save on the net.

Comparative-pricing guides: most sites (especially those that deal with technology) link to other online retailers to help buyers find the lowest price on the goods they desire.

Promotional codes: never confirm an online purchase until that "coupon" box at the checkout screen is filled.

Consumers can save even more money by checking search engine sites like Google.com for promotional codes. Signing up to e-newsletters on frequently visited Web sites can also provide discounts, too.

Web sites devoted to online deals: sites like FatWallet.com and Ebates.com have dedicated staffers (and an online community of the budget-conscious) who compile all sorts of bargains from a vast array of online retailers.

Keeping these tips in mind will ensure that everyone will get what they want, without breaking the bank.♦

Will Ferrell breaks his norm in this 'Stranger Than Fiction' mix of comedy, drama

By SAMANTHA THACKER
Staff Writer

In the new movie "Stranger Than Fiction," Will Ferrell plays an upright and overall hollow IRS agent named Harold Crick.

Crick's apt affinity for numbers and his obsessive-compulsive counting of toothbrush strokes are his most enticing attributes.

One day, however, during a vigorous session of compulsive teeth-brushing, Harold hears the woman who is narrating his life as he lives it.

Harold questions his sanity with time as he continues to hear this voice mimicking his every move.

Knowing that this voice is truly a narrator and not schizophrenia, Harold decides to see a local university professor, Dr. Jules Hilbert (Dustin Hoffman), in the hopes that he will prescribe something for him other than medication.

In the midst of Harold's confusion, he meets Ana Pascal (Maggie Gyllenhaal) who Harold audits for deliberately not paying her taxes.

He instantly takes an interest in her, despite her disdainful remarks regarding how she hates the "tax man."

His troubles with Ms. Pascal become insignificant, however, when the narrator says, "Little did he know that events had been set in motion that would lead to his imminent death."

Harold Crick then becomes determined to find out whom this narrator is and if he can stop his "imminent death" from occurring.

After various attempts at discovering the identity of the ever-present woman who recites his every thought and move, Harold stumbles across the voice and image of Karen Eiffel (Emma Thompson), a famous novelist who is currently writing "Death and Taxes" — the book about Harold Crick.

Crick tracks down the author and reveals that her writings have been dictating his life and he implores her not to kill him off as she has planned to do.

Does the author kill him off in the end? You'll have to go see the movie to find out.

If you are looking for a typical Will Ferrell film which is filled with wacky gimmicks and off-the-wall improvisation, you will not find these elements in "Stranger Than Fiction."

Although Ferrell and company elicit several hearty laughs throughout the course of the film, it has a strong dramatic undercurrent and a lot of emotional depth.

Ferrell truly displays his talent in this film by giving a strong, straight-faced performance.

I was convinced of this when I acknowledged Ferrell's ability to cry on-screen.

With an eclectic and talented cast consisting of Gyllenhaal, Thompson, Queen Latifah and Hoffman, you can be sure that "Stranger Than Fiction" will provide a satisfying movie-going experience.

Collectively, the performances are strong, the plot and dialogue are witty, yet heart-wrenching and this is truly one of those movies that makes you think about life.

With that being said, this dramatic comedy is one of the best pictures of the season.

Be sure to see this film — you will not regret it.

"Stranger Than Fiction" is PG-13 and is currently playing at theaters throughout the area.♦

Lynch rises to stardom as freshman

Lynch has risen to the top of APSU's roster to lead the Lady Govs to a much-improved fall season. Lynch's steadfast swing and veteran-like play has earned her a 79th national ranking while re-invigorating the Lady Govs team.

APSU women's golfer Staci Lynch has won two tournaments and finished in the top-10 in four of the five tournaments in which she has participated during her first semester with the Lady Govs.

Local product posts two wins in fall

Going from high school golf to college golf can be a huge change for a lot of players. Unless, of course, your high school career involved going undefeated during the regular season, ranking fourth in Tennessee's 2006 golf class, and 117th nationally, winning the regional championship and being in the National Honor Society.

Those are a few of the things freshman Lady Govs golfer Staci Lynch accomplished in during her high school career at local Rossville High School in Clarksville.

So it shouldn't have been much of a surprise to many that she made the transition look unproblematic.

"I knew she would be good when I recruited her," head coach Sara Burkhead said. "I just figured it would take her at least another semester to get to the point where she is right now."

The point that Burkhead is talking about is being one of the best golfers in the country. Lynch finished the fall 2006 season ranked 79th among Division I golfers.

She is the highest-ranked golfer in the Ohio Valley Conference with the second-closest opponent being Jacksonville State freshman Michelle Thompson who is currently ranked 140th.

"I had a lot of expectations for myself and of my team coming into this year but nothing like what was accomplished," Lynch said. "I am extremely pleased that I had two wins because I didn't expect to get any. I just wanted to have a few top-10 finishes, so I am really surprised at how well I ended up doing."

Lynch finished the fall season with a 90.4 winning percentage and a 74.2 scoring average. In the five tournaments she played, she finished in the top-10 in four of them and gained two medals. Lynch's hard work is what sets her apart from other OVC golfers.

"She has a lot of leadership qualities that she brings to the team," Burkhead said. "She is really good at not letting her opponents intimidate her, so her calming nerves settle the rest of our team down. I can say that our entire team got better with some of that coming from her. She just motivates the team."

Lynch chose Austin Peay State University because Clarksville is her home, and she has a big support system here.

"It was an easy choice to come here, with family, friends and coaches all behind me," Lynch said. "I love it here. We play a lot more than we did in high school, but all my coaches and teammates have helped me to transition well here."

Besides finishing in the top-10 in nearly every tournament, Lynch already has her name in the APSU record books.

Earlier this year at the Wachovia-Great Smokies Intercollegiate where she won the tournament, Lynch finished with a four under par 140, beating the school record for lowest 36-round by four strokes.

Two tournaments later, the Lady Govs hosted the F&M Bank APSU Intercollegiate, in which Lynch again took home top honors by shooting a four over 146, winning the tournament by eight strokes. So far in her brief collegiate career, Lynch has scored as low as 69 in a tournament with her high topping out at 79.

Although she had a successful fall season, Lynch believes she still has room to improve in order to reach her full potential as a great golfer for the Lady Govs.

"I think I need to work on wedges and getting it closer to the hole by working a lot with my coach this winter, continue to give 100 percent in practice and taking it day by day," Lynch said. "I want to have five top-10 finishes and win the OVC tournament as a team next year."♦

Lockett, Reed lead Govs scoring with play down low

By MICHAEL KELLUM

Assistant Sports Editor

The Austin Peay State University men's basketball team kicked off the 2006-2007 regular season Saturday with a loss to Atlantic-10 opponent Dayton, 78-62.

The game was tied at five early in the first half when the Flyers took off. The Govs played catch-up the entire first half, erasing an 18-point deficit to bring Dayton's lead down to eight, 41-33, going into the second half.

"The last thing we said before going into the second half was the game could be won or lost within the first few minutes of the second half," head coach Dave Loos said.

But the Flyers wouldn't allow a comeback in the second half, hitting their first six out of nine shots while the Govs couldn't match the hot shooting, only hitting one basket in six attempts in the first four minutes of action.

Dayton went up by as many as 20 points with 15:39 left in the game. The Govs continued to try to come back on four different occasions, the last coming with 2:18 left to play as sophomore guard Landon Shipley nailed a three-pointer, but the Govs never could get closer than 11 points.

"I think we really learned about ourselves in this game, and I hope that we can improve each time out,"

— Dave Loos, APSU men's basketball coach

"We had a chance to change the momentum of the game but couldn't get it done" Loos said.

The Governors shot 39.1 percent from the floor compared to the Flyers' 43.6 percent. APSU shot 21 percent from three-point range and 44 percent from the free throw line, being outscored in both categories by the Flyers.

The Govs led the Flyers in a few categories, including points in the paint (28-22), scoring off turnovers (19-18), points off fast breaks (14-11), bench points (23-14) and second chance-points (13-9).

"We have to be more patient offensively," Loos said. "Our free throw shooting has to improve, and we have to execute better man-to-man offense."

The Govs had two players posting in double figures, with Fernandez Lockett scoring 16 points and pulling down nine rebounds while Drake Reed chipped in another 16 points and seven rebounds.

Loos said while he was disappointed with the loss, his team knows what they have to work on in order to improve.

"We have to step it up defensively," he said. "We let them get too deep inside. We also have to guard the ball better, and our post has to show up on ball screens. I think we really learned about ourselves in this game, and I hope that we can improve each time out."♦

APSU 35, Illinois 80

APSU men's basketball team fell to national powerhouse, Illinois, Monday night, 80-35. The Fighting Illini out-rebounded the Governors 42-24 while also knocking down more than 50 percent of their field goals and three-point attempts.

Freshman forward Wes Channels led the Govs in scoring with 11 total points while junior guard Todd Babbington and sophomore Drake Reed filed in with seven and six points, respectively. The loss sends APSU to 0-2 on the season.♦

Govs pound Eagles

Fletcher exploits Eagles' weakness

By MARLON SCOTT

Staff Writer

When asked about his expectations for the Austin Peay State University football team before their road matchup with Morehead State, a team the Govs have not beat in 10 years — Govs head coach Carroll McCray responded like any other head coach.

"I expect to have a great game, and I expect to win," he said.

The Govs fulfilled McCray's expectations and beat Morehead State 23-21 on a rainy Saturday in Morehead, Ky.

As expected, junior running back Chris Fletcher had an epic day, rushing for 197 yards and three touchdowns. However, a perfect game by junior quarterback Mark Cunningham and a whole game's worth of solid defense are what ultimately led the Govs to victory.

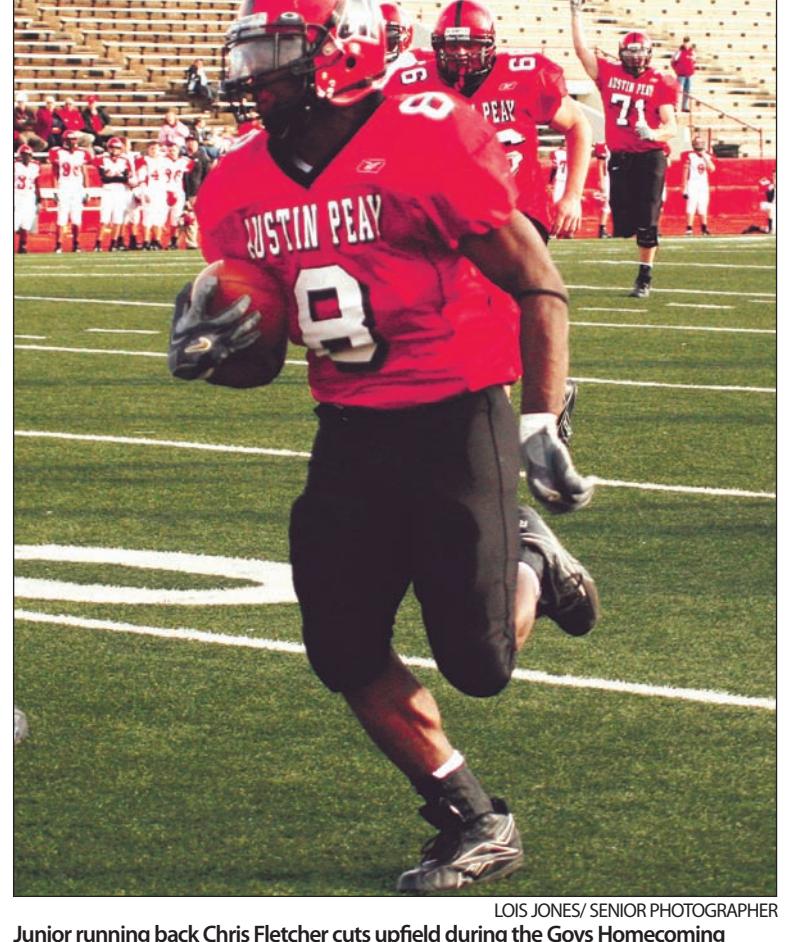

The Govs wasted no time scoring as Fletcher ended a two-play drive with a 45-yard touchdown run, 54 seconds into the game.

The APSU defense was then able to hold Morehead scoreless until the second quarter when Eagles' senior running back Jabari McGee plowed across the goal line from one yard out. McGee rushed for 93 yards and three touchdowns in the game.

The momentum seemed to swing in Morehead's favor when the Eagles blocked an APSU punt that eventually set up another McGee touchdown, giving the Eagles a 14-7 lead.

After some trickery that converted a long fourth down, sophomore kicker Ross Coffee made a 29-yard field goal before the half to give the Govs the lead, 16-14.

Cunningham only completed eight of his 23 pass attempts for 107 yards, but he managed the game well and did not throw any interceptions. His favorite target in the game was sophomore wide receiver Lanis Frederick. Frederick had four catches for 81 yards in the game and is two receptions short of the APSU single-season reception record.

After the Govs first drive in the second half that ended in Fletcher's third touchdown for the day, the game became a defensive battle. Despite several APSU three-and-outs, the Govs defense held Morehead scoreless until the fourth quarter.

Morehead State quarterback Brian Yost produced a scoring drive with seven minutes left in the fourth quarter that cut APSU's lead to two. Yost completed 15-of-33 pass attempts for 146 yards and one interception in the game.

Unlike past games this season, the Govs defense did not fall apart late in the game. They continued to play hard and junior linebacker Josh Hackett intercepted a Yost pass to the end zone at the end of the game.

The Govs' record improves to 3-7 with the win, marking the first time the team has posted more than two wins in three years. The team has also won two of its past three games.

APSU will take on Sun Belt Conference member Western Kentucky in Bowling Green, Ky., Saturday at 4 p.m.♦

Chattanooga dominates Lady Govs Bacon, Hale lead Lady Govs struggling offense on road

By MARLON SCOTT

Staff Writer

The Austin Peay State University women's basketball team lost its first game of the season on the road to the University of Tennessee at Chattanooga, 80-56.

"We showed some improvement from the exhibition game," head coach Carrie Daniels said. "But we still have a long way to go. Chattanooga is a good, well-coached team that shoots well."

Junior forward Alex Anderson led the Lady Mocs with 12 points in the first half and 23 total points for the game.

Chattanooga maintained the lead throughout the first half because of turnovers. The Lady Mocs scored 15 points off of 12 APSU turnovers in the first half.

By capitalizing on the Lady Govs' mistakes and controlling the paint,

"We showed some improvement from the exhibition game. But we still have a long way to go."

— Carrie Daniels, APSU women's basketball coach

Chattanooga was able to withstand all of the Lady Govs' offensive runs. The Lady Mocs shot 47 percent (31-of-66) from the field and out-rebounded APSU, 44-36.

The Lady Govs were only able to score six points off 12 forced Chattanooga turnovers. APSU's offensive production was equally spread, with 10 of the team's 11 rostered players posting points. However, none of them managed to produce more than three points, except for junior guard Amber Bacon and senior guard Saundra Hale.

Bacon scored 20 points off the bench, including four three-pointers. Hale played all 40 minutes, generating 19 points and five assists during the contest.

"Saundra and Amber played well, but they need some help," Daniels said. "We have got to pick up our defensive efforts."

APSU's defensive effort seemed to vanish as the game progressed in the second half. Two minutes into the second half, Chattanooga pushed their 38-22 lead up to 21 points, 47-26. The Lady Govs never pulled within 13 points the remainder of the game.

The Lady Govs were unable to establish any game inside the paint. Chattanooga penetrated the lane at will and got second chance baskets constantly. Besides making only one of their eight shots from the field, the Lady Govs centers managed a meager two blocked shots and 13 of the 36 total rebounds.

The Lady Govs now face questions regarding who is going to step up and do the dirty work, such as crashing the boards and physically protecting the paint. APSU will need to find answers fast.♦
